Mission: Since the fifties, Venezuela has been growing rapidly, demographically as well as economically, with a strong dependence on oil exports which have brought along considerable material benefits but also damage to the environment.

As from 1970, the government has been giving a high priority to environmental matters. In 1976, basic laws aimed at the protection of the environment were issued and in 1977, the Ministry of Environment and Renewable Natural Resources (MARNR) was created. This Ministry is the official body responsible for the national environmental policy and the sustainable use of natural resources. Its motto is "Environment and Development".

The objectives and the overall mission of the MARNR are to achieve development without destruction, to increase the quality of life through conservation of the natural heritage and protection of the environment, to plan the use of land, to develop public awareness, to provide the necessary advice, and to produce guidelines for environmental policy, monitoring and control.

Within the MARNR four autonomous institutions exist whose activities aim to improve environmental quality and sustainable use of renewable natural resources.
